

11

Creating « a Place to Feel at Home » Christian church life and social control in Lusaka, Zambia (1970s)

Wim van Binsbergen

Introduction¹

While Robert Buijtenhuijs is principally known for his path-breaking work on African revolutionary movements, this inevitably brought him repeatedly to a consideration of the religious dimension of African political movements. This forced him to pay considerable attention to African historical religion and Christian churches in the case of Kenyan Mau Mau, and to Islam in the case of Chadian Frolinat. Here Buijtenhuijs' principal inspiration derived from the work of his Ph.D. supervisor George Balandier (1963, 1965b), as well as from Terence Ranger's seminal study on the «Connexions between "primary resistance movements" and modern mass nationalism» (Ranger, 1968). Repeatedly Robert Buijtenhuijs has sought both to apply these theoretical perspectives in the specific context of his own research (Buijtenhuijs, 1978, 1992c), and to contribute to the more general theoretical reflection in this field (Buijtenhuijs, 1976, 1985c ; van Binsbergen & Buijtenhuijs, 1976). Having myself undergone the inspiration of Ranger's work while working in Zambia in the early 1970s, it was at the Leiden African Studies Centre, and in collaboration with my generous senior colleague there, Robert Buijtenhuijs, that I published some of my first work on African religion and politics. It is therefore fitting that my contribution to this volume honouring this impressive international scholar

1. The data on which this paper is based were collected, by the author and his assistants Messrs. P.A. Mutesi and D.K. Shiyowe, in the course of field-work in Lusaka, Zambia, in the period February 1972 to July 1973. The project (initially entitled A sociological study of religion in Lusaka) was funded by the Research and Higher Degrees Committee of the University of Zambia, and by CROMIA (The Churches' Research on Marriage in Africa). Further work on this material was made possible in the course of my appointment at the African Studies Centre, which also enabled me to repeatedly revisit Lusaka in the years 1981-1995. I am grateful to R. Bergh, W. Heinemeyer, D. Jaeger and L. van de Berg for helpful comments on an earlier draft.

Initially my own research in urban Zamibia focused on the classification of churches, their formal organizations structures and inter-church interactions, as an exercise in the sociology of organizations more than as an exploration of the emerging urban society as a whole. In later years I was exploring the rural-urban relations of an ethnic minority (the Nkoya) whose pursuit of autochthonous, neo-traditional forms of religion rather outweighed their participation in Christian churches. However, somewhere between these two phases I occupied myself for two years (1972-73) with part-time field-work in the two phases I experienced precisely the two relatively unexplored topics mentioned above: the contribution of formal Christianity to illuminate one of the social contexts in which such dialogue, and other forms of intra-religious dialogues, will be particularly put to the test: the African continent but since solidly rooted here, and ramifying into a great variety of localising, African forms. More importantly, my argument seeks to illuminate one of the social contexts in which such dialogue, and other forms of intra-religious dialogues, will be clarified by such a project. For this religious may yet have a crucial role to play.

The present paper pretends no more than to indicate certain descriptive and analytical themes as might be clarified by such a project. The religious situation in Africa is far from clear-cut. There are two main areas where religious life is most prominent, which goes on continuously in contemporary Africa: that between historic forms of Christianity and world-view, on the one hand, and on the other hand religiously in urban environments, which has gained dominance in the course of African life and religiosity in the twenty-first century. In Africa and elsewhere, towns are the laboratories where, out of social, cultural and religious forms converging there on a world-wide basis, new answers are constantly formulated and tested out for the moral and symbolic predilections of people uprooted from once closely-knit and meaningful communities (cf. Shorter, 1991; ter Haar, 1991). The present paper suggests that in this process of re-orientation and re-anchorage, organised Christianity has a crucial role to play.

More recently I had the opportunity of pursuing these topics in extensive anthropological field-work in a different Southem African urban context, that of Botswana's capital city Gaborone. Here the opportunities for comparative research are vast, especially upon the vastly expanding urban society, pastoral theology, etc. End of the 1960s (with Stefanszyn, 1962 as an early, minor exception). David Wiley's doctoral research (1971) was to be the first of a series of interesting explorations in which however sociological concerns still tended to be blended with research priorities derived from such fields as symbolic interactionism, as an exercise in the sociology of organizations more than as an exploration of the emerging urban society as a whole. In later years I was exploring the rural-urban relations of an ethnic minority (the Nkoya) whose pursuit of autochthonous, neo-traditional forms of religion rather outweighed their participation in Christian churches. However, somewhere between these two phases I occupied myself for two years (1972-73) with part-time field-work in the two phases I experienced precisely the two relatively unexplored topics mentioned above: the contribution of formal Christianity to illuminate one of the social contexts in which such dialogue, and other forms of intra-religious dialogues, will be particularly put to the test: the African continent but since solidly rooted here, and ramifying into a great variety of localising, African forms. More importantly, my argument seeks to illuminate one of the social contexts in which such dialogue, and other forms of intra-religious dialogues, will be clarified by such a project. For this religious may yet have a crucial role to play.

The present paper pretends no more than to indicate certain descriptive and analytical themes as might be clarified by such a project. The religious situation in Africa is far from clear-cut. There are two main areas where religious life is most prominent, which goes on continuously in contemporary Africa: that between historic forms of Christianity and world-view, on the one hand, and on the other hand religiously in urban environments, which has gained dominance in the course of African life and religiosity in the twenty-first century. In Africa and elsewhere, towns are the laboratories where, out of social, cultural and religious forms converging there on a world-wide basis, new answers are constantly formulated and tested out for the moral and symbolic predilections of people uprooted from once closely-knit and meaningful communities (cf. Shorter, 1991; ter Haar, 1991). The present paper suggests that in this process of re-orientation and re-anchorage, organised Christianity has a crucial role to play.

should take up a theme of African religious studies which over the years has been particularly cherished by Robert Bujumbu. In the process of transition to modern social and political life, self-organisation in the form of a Christian church created for twenty-first century Africans a viable, and often the only, opportunity to create for themselves «a place to feel at home» (Wellebonn & Ogot, 1996). We have known Bujumbu as a scholar who himself, when he is not passionately reading newspaper archives, feels best at home at the national level, blending in with African revolutionaries, having wonderfully informative interviews with their adversaries, and unobtrusively joining national democratic assemblies, as a tolerated insider-outsider. The pleasures and frustrations of the typical prolonged local-level anthropological field-work have always been lost on him, and instead he chose to make himself invisible, but eminently perceptive, in the African polyclinal and religious organisation, life-style and class formation as the 1970s : researchers sought to explore the patterns of urban social, of modern African towns, the study of African urbanisation gained impetus in the 1970s : researchers sought to explore the patterns of urban social, mainly life in other parts of Africa, in the wake of Sundkler's pioneer studies, in Zambia the sociological study of modern religious urban churches became a major topic in Africanist research including urban study (1961), the study of Christianity and particularly of independent churches while in other parts of Africa, in the wake of Sundkler's pioneer studies, in Zambia the sociological study of modern religious urban churches became a major topic in Africanist research including urban study (1961), the study of Christianity and particularly of independent churches (b) the study of that dominant form of voluntary associations in South Africa, cf. Epstein, 1981), and (a) the study of the domestic domain of urban kinship and family life (however, cf. Epstein, 1981), and Central African towns : Christian churches.

(b) the study of that dominant form of voluntary associations in South Africa, cf. Epstein, 1981), and Central African towns : Christian churches.

besides, they had two major blind spots : rural inputs for an understanding of contemporary urban African society ; rural inputs for an understanding of contemporary urban African society ;

Here the fundamental theoretical and descriptive puzzle revolves on the society at large.

One would expect that out of the interplay between these and similar factors, new and specifically urban patterns of social relations have emerged in town, which on the one hand cater for the more intimate, «informal» spheres of domestic life, neighbourhoodly relations and the structuring of relatively small-scale structural niches (wards, compounds, sections, suburbs), and on the other hand link these micro phenomena of the urban scene to the broad organisational and political patterns of modern Zambian society.

(d) Emanating from the political and administrative centre of the post-colonial state there are formal organisations such as the municipal administration, the police and the judiciary (in the specific form of urban courts) in which the new urbanites may only peripherally and occasionally participate, as clients, but which yet to a considerable extent set the contours of the emerging patterns of urban relationships the inhabitants of the new and expanding townships engage in.

(c) Specifically urban-based formal, «modern» voluntary organisations - which may or may not be concerned with their rural counterparts. If so, these organisations may represent a welcome continuity between rural and urban life - e.g. urban migrants finding an urban reception structure in an urban congregation of a church they had already joined when still «back home». However, when such continuity is absent, urban migrants may become specifically involved in new or different urban-based formal organisations, in terms of life-style, political and economic goals and ideologies themselves, in their new, urban social relationships whose referents are no longer centered into effective urban social relations.

(b) Urban transformations of rural-based forms of formal, «modern» organisations, such as represented by e.g. churches, political parties and other voluntary associations in which contemporary rural people used to participate before migrating to town.

(a) Urban transformations of intra-paternal relationships or social relations in the domestic sphere.

against the background of values and collective representations of various origins and in a general state of flux, accommodation and change – patterns specific between individual townspeople – heads of households as well as their co-resident dependants). In this context, where most urbanites can still be considered to be relatively recent migrants from rural areas, one would expect to see at least the following main factors of urban social structure at work:

a committee of the ethnography of urban and rural health care in Zambia: van Binsbergen, W.M.J., 1979.

In this exploration, our leading question will be : what is the stuff that Zam比亚 urban society is made of ? In this part of the African continent towns (as structurally and functionally complex and heterogeneous large-scale concentrations of human habitation) only came into being during the colonial period. Towards the end of that period the state's initial urban influx control (cf. Heisler, 1974) waned, and it ceased to exist entirely when Zambia attained independence in 1964. How did the several million who had switched between a rural youth and an equally rural retirement cope with the problem of creating and maintaining a more or less viable pattern of urban life ? For the purpose of our present discussion I should like to take the obvious economic determinants of urban life (in terms of labour migration, rural-urban flows of cash and labour power, and the organisation of the urban, national and world economy) for granted, and the patterns of social organisation that give rise to broad social categories, whose more or less enduring interrelations - both formal and informal, and

Continuity and transformation in the sociology of urban Zambia

Significant changes have occurred in that urban setting since the date of the field-work in the early 1970s. The United National Independence Party, then the ruling party and in control of much of the social processes, especially in the squatter areas where formal state structures were breaking down, has retreated to a minority position. The hardening of class lines and the decline of the Zambian economy over much of the 1970s and 1980s has had a tightening effect on urban接收 of migrants and on urban relations in general; awareness of AIDS has translated these attitudes to the sexual sphere, where far greater reticence can now be observed. Yet with these corrections, the intermediate relations between church and urban society as explored in the present paper would appear to be far from obsolete.

purpose, I shall follow a line of argument that has proved useful in illuminating in the context of Zambian urban studies. I shall start out with detailed presentation of relatively unprocessed material focusing on just one urban protagonist. Such data retain something of the real life of urban Zambians, and allow us to become familiar with at least one of its inhabitants while at the same time structural relations and contradictions can be seen a work which, despite their unique bearing on this particular case, and individual, yet can be shown – in the subsequent discussion and conclusion – to be fairly representative for the Zambian urban structure as a whole.

again the pioneering work was done by Mitchell, 1965), and what is there might be construed to apply to other aspects of the ultra dynamics as well. Parkin casts the initial findings on this point in the of the following hypothesis:

Yet urbanites' continued interaction with their rural kin, and their much-documented capability of resuming their rural existence, suggests a very considerable continuity between town and country - as if the transformation of rural forms in the course of their urban existence is far from irreversible, and retains detectable traces of the rural input. Or, again, as it is between town and country in South Central Africa a considerable common element - a deep structure? - of social forms and ideology has evolved, elements and potentialities of which may be selectively and situationally stressed according to whether one finds oneself in town or in the village, without denying the considerable undeniability and continuity.

The determinants of the dialectics I am hinting at here, have rather eluded scholarly analysis. So far we have only just begun to spell out the rules of selection and transformation that appear to govern the interplay between the urban migrants, rural input, formal voluntary organisations, and the state, as the three major sociological factors. Admittedly, scholarship has addressed the difference to either rural or urban mystacial relations (in addition, again, to economic factors). Admittedly, explanations of misfortune (Parikh, 1975: 24-7) and references cited there;

6 More recently the same theme was taken up by Argyle, J., 1991 and Matango, A.B.K., 1992. The locus classicus on these issues is: Gluckman, H.M., 1971.

latrice importance of continuity and transformation. Already since 956⁶ we have known that rural cultural and social-organisational elements articulately patterns of ethnic perception and inter-ethnic interaction in the urban environment do no emulate rural models but take on totally new forms, largely determined by the one-stranded and selective, individual-centred nature of urban social (network) contacts within an overall framework of capitalist relations of production and consumption. Likewise precisely because of the capitalist relations of urban housing and differentiation and to which they will often return upon retirement, On the ideological level, rural notions of power and causation, supernatural intervention, evil and healing could be expected to lose much of their applicability when the people who carry these collective representations across the urban boundaries: into a sphere of social life where the effects of formal bureaucratic power and authority, and the scientific principles of causation and modern technology and health care, loom rather larger than they end to do in even contemporary African villages.

Roman Catholic Church for various reasons, and those who want to join the church.

«Marrage is also a very important field of activity for us. When a young man wants to marry, he approaches the members of Action and Reformed». The leaders of other churches : A.M.E., Anglican and live nearby in Kapemperere : Mrs. Nchilouu for the Anglicans, and

«At times, when we are invited to do so, we combine our activities with the Action groups of other churches : A.M.E., Anglican and Reformed». The leaders of other churches : A.M.E., Anglican and live nearby in Kapemperere : Mrs. Nchilouu for the Anglicans, and

«When a woman does not have a man to support her, Action gives her bread for the Reformed Church.

«When a man is in trouble, his wife will come and ask my husband to appeal to all people, regardless of whether they are Christians or not.

«When a woman is ill she is assisted to keep her home clean, e.g. women come sweeping and drawing water for her. This food and clothes. When a woman is ill she is assisted to keep her home

«When a Christian backsides, Action tends to visit him or her help him. I will cook food for her.

«Another important activity is that we help people without relatives in town, to arrange funerals. At the time of a funeral, all church people of the township gather together : Reformed, Anglicans and Catholics.

If the deceased is a woman, the women must bathe and dress her before she is put into the coffin. In case of a man it is men who do at the deceased has left behind any small children, a week is spent before a good Christian used to be helped by Action, e.g. in the way of finding them school places¹², and taking care of them in every way.

(8) «Where a Christian in town wants to go back to his or her home in the rural areas, the church does assist e.g. by giving money. For example, these days this is not done any more.

«When a Christian in the family way, Mr. Phiri, my husband, sent me to his home village about these matters in the church.

(12) «Something like that happened to myself once. At one time when I was in the family way, Mr. Phiri, my husband, sent me to his home village about these matters in the church.

14. K : Kwacha, the Zambian currency ; at the time of the research, K1 equalled about US$1.32.

15. A Catholic priest's professional title in Nyanga ; the basic meaning of bamba is : Sir.

17. Courts, both urban and rural ones, are very frequently resorted to in Zambia, also for cases involving a breach of respect, bodily integrity, accusations of being a sorcerer, etc.

For a small amount (K10.50) the plaintiff files the case, after which the defendant is summonsed to the court ; for this reason initiating a court case is called, in Zambian English, buying a summons.

13. Mwila is a Roman Catholic Mission in Eastern Province, Zambia, c. 300 km. east of Lusaka.

11. A.M.E. : African Methodist Episcopal Church, a long-established North American denomination imported into southern Africa by the end of the nineteenth century, and among the few Christian churches which unusually supported the Zambian struggle for independence ; cf. Johnson, W.R., 1974, 1977, 1979. In the three churches mentioned, the lay organizations equivalent to Catholic Action are, of course, called by different names – contrary to what the respondent suggests.

12. Especially in towns, in Zambia the available number of places at primary and secondary schools tends to fall short of the actual demand, so people have to be very resourceful if they want to get their children placed.

13. Mwila is a Roman Catholic Mission in Eastern Province, Zambia, c. 300 km. east of Lusaka.

a which would ever come to my house at night I would sit once wake up and confront him outside. When one of my relatives at home is sick or dies I always know without being told, and as a rule I will have told others about it two or three days before word about the death reaches here from home.

17) "Some times however, I give you an example.
18) "I have a son who was born in 1947 and who is now working as a shunter on the railways here in Lusaka. He got married to the daughter of one of our neighbours. I arranged their marriage in a Christian way, despite the fact that the parents of the girl are notdaughters. I arranged their marriage in a
19) "At one stage my son had to go for three months of training in Kabwe. He left his wife in my care. I took the responsibility of feeding and clothing this young woman since my son did not send any money from Kabwe; during this time his wife gave birth, too.
20) "I did all the housework. I cleaned the house and cooked food and washed the plates. My daughter-in-law woke up in the morning, made her bed, ate breakfast and went to her mother nearby. I would call her for lunch and supper. She never bothered to wash up after meals. I did not mind at all because I thought : "This is just a young girl who is

19) «At one stage my son had to go for three months of training in Kabwe22. He left his wife in my care. I took the responsibility of feeding and clothing this young woman since my son did not send any religious at all.

(21) "When there was only one week left before my son was to return still immature to do housework."

the house of her own mother; Rosamond came over again every evening. I still did not care. Later on my daughter-in-law came and started shouting at me. She went back to her mother's house and later all her relatives came to me. Mrs. Tembo, my son's mother-in-law, wanted to fight with me but I refused, because I was going on trial to Chippataz where my brother was taken ill; and besides I felt no need to fight over nothing. However, Mrs. Tembo hit me twice in the face before I lost my temper. I grabbed her and started working on her. I hit her with my head in her stomach, and she fell to the ground. I grabbed her throat and tore her clothes. Six people from Tembo's house (including her old mother, the one who has only one eye) came to her rescue but I beat them all. I used anything that

22. Kabwe is a town along the Zambezi River; 23. Chipata is the capital of Zambia's Eastern Province.

(15) I have seen it with my own eyes, in Malawi, where my father came from. There was a man who had the power to catch sorcerers¹⁹. He would blow his horn in the four directions of the globe and all sorcerers would come running, bringing to this man all that they used for their evil work : roots, horns, parts of the human body, whatever. The repelling sorcerer would then be given a small cut on the forehead²⁰, and if he would ever practise witchcraft again he would surely die.

(16) «I myself have evil spirits (mashabé)²¹. If a person who practices witchcraft comes near me I will know it immediately. My hair stands on end, then, and my whole body behaves in an extraordinary way. If being a sorcerer means that one has a personnal, and indissoluble, contract with an invisible family, the sorcerer provides the familiar spirit with the means to harm and kill other human beings, in exchange for secret benefits repaid by the sorcerer. If the sorcerer attempts to break the terms of the contract, or she, too, is supposed to fall victim to the family's curse, the sorcerer splits with the means to harm and kill her human family; the sorcerer provides the familiar spirit with the means to harm and kill other human beings, in exchange for secret benefits repaid by the sorcerer. If the sorcerer distinguishes himself, a wide-spread institution in South Central Africa, cf. van Binsbergen, W.M.J., 1981 : ch. 4, and references cited there. The analogyical distinction between sorcerer and witch was not made in the Nyauja discourse.

(17) On which-finding, a wide-spread institution in South Central Africa, cf. van Binsbergen, W.M.J., 1981 : ch. 4, and references cited there. The analogyical distinction between sorcerer and witch was not made in the Nyauja discourse.

(18) Implicit reference is made to the belief, widespread in Southern Central Africa, that 19. On which-finding, a wide-spread institution in South Central Africa, cf. van Binsbergen, W.M.J., 1981 : ch. 4, and references cited there. The analogyical distinction between sorcerer and witch was not made in the Nyauja discourse.

(19) 20. Which-finding in twentieth-century Malawi as a rule combines Christian orthodoxy with superstitious ones, we may note too far reflected to interpret this small elements with which suchorthodoxies coexist, cf. Van Binsbergen, W.M.J., 1981 : ch. 4-7, and references cited there.

(20) The informant here refers to cults of affliction, a dominant religioous idiom in twentieth-century South Central Africa ; cf. Van Binsbergen, W.M.J., 1981 : ch. 4-7, and references cited there.

(13) «Besides marriage, we also take care of sorcerers. When a member is found out by other church members to possess evil powers or sorcery, he is approached by the leaders of the Legion and Action, and by the priest. We talk and talk until he clearly sees that Christianity and practical sorcery does not go together. It is really very difficult for this person, for he tends to believe that if he stops committing sorcery, he will die». We ask him to pray often. His medicine is taken every day from him and burnt.

- (32) «For instance, there was this woman who came all the way from Kasama²⁸ in order to see some specialists at University Teaching Hospital. She was very ill. She was staying with her sister²⁹ who lives next door to me. The husband of the woman from Kasama never came to see her. Until the day she died. Her sister could not bathe and clothe her before she was put into the coffin, saying that she had never seen such tasks and that she would not start that day³⁰. She was terribly scared to handle a dead body. Well, it was me who before performed such tasks and that she would not start that day³⁰. She was very thankful to me. He wanted to give me money and medicine to cleanse me from [the supernatural pollution contracted when] handling the dead body. But because I am a religious woman I did all this for her. The dead woman's husband arrived that day and before performing such tasks and that she would not start that day³⁰, he was terribly scared to handle a dead body. Well, it was me who did all this for her. The dead woman's husband arrived that day and before performing such tasks and that she would not start that day³⁰. She was very thankful to me. He wanted to give me money and medicine to cleanse me from [the supernatural pollution contracted when] handling the dead body. But because I am a religious woman I returned to Livingstone. Only last week I received a letter from this Action. I looked after this woman well, giving her food and K6 to Kapemperere people and she was directed to Kapemperere. In could find Legion people and she was directed to Kapemperere. In Chipata, when the man disappeared leaving his wife stranded at Kasama Bus station³². The wife inquiries from people where she two people came from Livingstone³¹ and were on their way to two strangers. That is why I could become the woman's Vice-Mamastranger. There is a good Christian and care for your neighbours and even are really a good Christians and care for your neighbours and even Tembo used to be chairman of that section but was voted down Kapemperere. He is also Vice-Chairman of businessmen in politics around here. He is also an important man for personal reasons. My husband, Mr. Phiri, is also an important man chairman in the next elections. The present chairman wishes to resign sources that a group of women has decided to elect me as full Tembo used to be chairman of that section but was voted down Kapemperere. He and his wife were involved in a substantive act. They because he had no respect for his people and was not helpful. Only recently he and his wife were involved in a substantive act. They biologica sisters.
- (33) «Or take the case of this woman whose husband deserted her. These refused all these offers.
- (34) «You know what? People cannot fail to recognize it in the end, if you woman thanking her for the service I had done.
- (35) «Mr. Tembo used to be chairman of that section but was voted down Kapemperere. He is also Vice-Chairman of businessmen in politics around here. He is Vice-Chairman of our section in Tembo used to be chairman of that section but was voted down Kapemperere.
28. Kasama is the capital of Zambia's Northern Province.
29. Impiled is : a classificatory sister ; the kin relation was fairly close, but not that of biological sisters.
30. In many parts of Zambia, such funerary tasks are never performed by close relatives but by members of a specific clan whom the deceased's clan has a joking relationship. This may have been a structural reason why the bereaved woman in this story could not prepare the body for burial, although the narrator discusses the episode merely at the level of the «sister», individual preferences and experiences.
31. The main bus station in Lusaka, near the town centre, and c. 10 km from the capital of Zambia's Southern Province.
32. The livingstone is the capital of Zambia's Southern Province.
33. Numbers between parentheses refer to numbered paragraphs in Mrs. Phiri's monologue above.

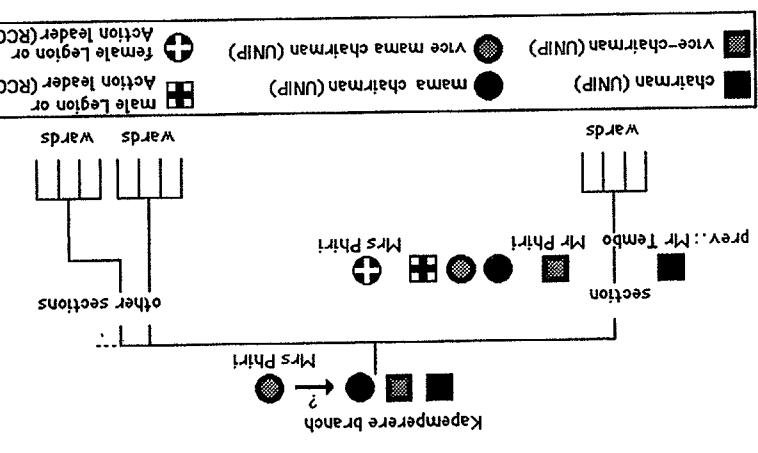

Figure 2 - Political and religious offices in Kapemperere

prepared a torch to go and burn down somebody's house. They were reported to the police and their case is now with the magistrate awaiting judgement.

33. Numbers between parentheses refer to numbered paragraphs in Mrs. Phiri's monologue above.
- The first part concentrates on the established Christian churches in the structure. The first part highlights, in a complex manner, our above discussion of elements of continuity and transformation in the urban social structure.
- Mrs. Phiri's monologue highlights, in a complex manner, our above structure of material and ideological/spiritual assistance, and finally as a structure of social control.
- a number of different but related headings : as a local formal organisation, townsip, and particularly their lay organisations. The church appears under relatives but by members of a specific clan whom the deceased's clan has a joking relationship. This may have been a structural reason why the bereaved woman in this story could not prepare the body for burial, although the narrator discusses the episode merely at the level of the «sister», individual preferences and experiences.
30. In many parts of Zambia, such funerary tasks are never performed by close relatives but by members of a specific clan whom the deceased's clan has a joking relationship. This may have been a structural reason why the bereaved woman in this story could not prepare the body for burial, although the narrator discusses the episode merely at the level of the «sister», individual preferences and experiences.
31. The livingstone is the capital of Zambia's Southern Province.
32. The main bus station in Lusaka, near the town centre, and c. 10 km from the capital of Zambia's Southern Province.
33. Numbers between parentheses refer to numbered paragraphs in Mrs. Phiri's monologue above.

maintain its membership, and to expand it by appropriate services to non-members (3). These assistance functions of the church are realised in close co-operation with the lay organisations of certain other local churches within the suburbs. These churches may have a similar organisational structure,

Thus the church constitutes an urban-based organization that seeks to maintain its membership, and to expand it by appropriate services to non-members (3).

Here the church's universalism is emphasised : its activities are not adiologica/spiritual assistance (7). Towards the end of Mrs. Phillips' account, the universality of the church is further expressed by geographical references that stretch across the vast Zambeian territory (32, 33).

A structure of material and ideological/spiritual assistance

The opportunities thus arises for the preparation of standards and powers within the township will become clear in the course of our discussion.

Yet, as we shall see below, organisations are not usually maintained, and a considerable convergence between churches, and between churches and other voluntary organisations is hinted at in Mrs. Phiri's account.

name church	cases	%
Roman Catholic	54	52.9
New Apostolic	1	1.0
Saviour Union Army	54	52.9
African Day Adventist	4	3.9
African Dutch reformed	10	9.8
United Church of Zambia	10	9.8
Watoto Church	10	9.8
Anglican	5	4.9
Baptist	2	2.0
Muslim	1	1.0
Church of the Nazarene	2	2.0
Church of Central Africa	1	1.0
Presbyterian

Some rough indication of the relative distribution of churches in Lusaka, although cases were non-adherents:

Relatively among 165 Lusaka male heads of households, taken from the following table derived from a survey in Kapemperde, can be gathered from the following table derived from a survey among 165 Lusaka male heads of households, undertaken in 1973 (the 63 cases is a useful means to make converts.

As the townsip is being formed and its administrative territorial layout defined, formal religious organisations appear, as if to saturate the new social space thus created. (1) The local, urban organisation of the church derives from the non-religious a non-religious administration of the new defined, formal religious organisations appear, as if to saturate the new social space thus created. (1) The local, urban organisation of the church derives from the non-religious a non-religious administration of the new suburb at the eastern fringe of Ustaka, in its totality formed a branch, organisation: that of the dominant political party. (2) Kapempere, a divided up into a number of different sections, each section consisting of a number of wards; this organisational structure was primarily created by the United National Independence Party (UNIP), but was soon carried over into many other aspects of life, including church organisation. The pattern of correspondence between the church and the overall formal organisational pattern of the contemporary Zambian society is invoked, in the account, in terms of a bureaucratic logic (2), e.g. the patterning of time according to a universal calendar, which dictates a fixed and repetitive routine of activities; and the formal, stylized language in which these activities are described and endowed with the respectability that ultimately derives from bureaucracy, legal authority in the sense of Max Weber (1969).

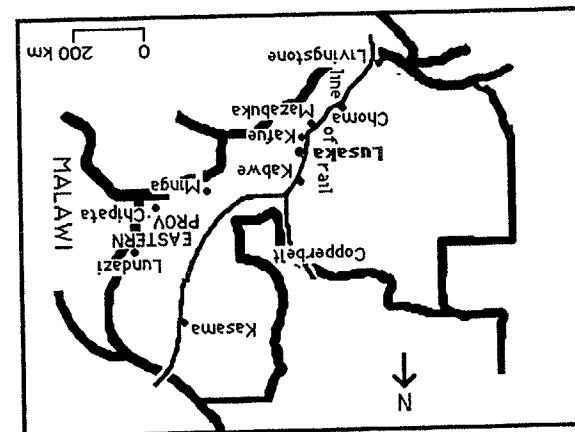

Figure 3. - Topographic references in this chapter

A local formal organisation
First the church (and within the church particularly the lay organisation whose social process appealed to be firmly in the control of local Zambians that also perverades other sectors of the modern Zambian society (2).

Also Mrs. Philp's excessively high income as an entrepreneur³⁷, we might suggest that, in her case at least, the Christian idiom, the organisational and leadership style in unequal relationships, have provided her with the major mechanism through which to convert economic capital into social power and hierarchical flavour (cf. the passage on concealing scandals, or the dichotomy of church work and of the urban community has a strong élitist, political capital within the emerging urban community of Kappemere. Her social power both at the domestic and at the community level, and makes her into a Christian woman). This reflects her formidable aspirations for status and autochthonous world-view featuring sourcey, possession spirits and medicines, Mrs. Philp's brand of Christianity certainly concentrates on rules of conduct, and on formal organisation. This may befit, perhaps, an ambitious member of an established mission church, but it is by no means a constant feature of Christianity in Alaska.

Within which they are presented rural kin patterns, the empirical Christian idiom comes to the audience rural kin patterns, the religious and/or political power free of charge. Thus the lay agents accumulate obligations among non-kin inhabitants of the townships - a social capital which (as Mrs. Phin very well free under the obligation to offer such great services traditional rural context are those under the obligation to offer such great services that stand in a joking relation vis-a-vis one another) that in the claims that belong to the social categories (numerary kinship, fixed pairs of without exception the appropriate traditional payments, and services without assumptions of reciprocity and equality. The lay agents the kin-based assumption of one-sided exchange that radically deteriorates a framework of essential transformation here. Such an idiom provides a framework of one-sided exchange that radically detracts the lay agents the kin-based assumption of reciprocity and equality.

But however close services by the church's lay organisations may offer in such situations.

Total	102	100.0
"Zionists"	1	1.0
Penteecostal Holiness	1	1.0
Zion Christian	2	2.0

The church as a relief organisation (5, 7) offers crisis support (in cases of illness, death, funerals, destitution, etc.) which in other (particularly rural) Zambian situations is provided by kin, clans, neighbours; and which in urban Zambia, as elsewhere in the modern world, may also be offered by a variety of voluntary organisations, including political parties³⁶, or by the state. In this respect the church's lay organisation may be said to offer, in town, a functional alternative for «traditional» rural forms of social organisation — with this proviso that also in heavily Christianised rural areas of origin the same church-based alternatives can be seen to operate: church organisations. However, even this continuity undergoes some transmutation in town, due to the greater ethnic and regional heterogeneity of the urban scene as compared to the rural areas, the greater flux of migrants and travellers in town, and the fact that in the rural areas church-based women's groups are more likely to coincide, in part, with local residential and kin migration (7, 33), also to the extent of assisting them in returning to their village homes when continued urban residence has become undesirable.

The church does operate as a support and reception structure for urban groupings.

In offering these forms of support, the church's tendency to universализм, further corroborated by inter-denominational co-operation, may reveal an aspiration to encompass as much as possible the entire social life of the township, also in its non-religious aspects. The format in which this support is offered (by a collective of local lay women) makes it all the easier to merge with the township's overall social process. The practical consequence is that the townships such as prayer (7), yet ideology and history (they are established mission churches under North Atlantic or South African dominance); yet it is remarkable that this ecumenical co-operation is achieved across major organisations that this historical lines: the Protestant churches belonging to the Christian Council of Zambia, of which the Roman Catholic Church is not a member. (4) With regard to the local urban community denominational distinctions tend to

church membership of spouses	cases	%
husband belongs to a church, wife does not	15	9.1
wife belongs to a church, husband does not	6	3.6
neither husband nor wife belongs to a church	51	30.9
husband and wife belongs to the same church	71	43.0
husband and wife belonging to different churches	12	7.3
other, non-interpretable	10	6.1
Total	165	100.0

39. The sample survey referred to above yielded the following results on church membership of spouses:

As her account of her own marital conflicts already indicates, the church-based structure of social control may not prevent temporary disruption of marital relationships, extramarital sex, concubinage, etc.; but it does offer a structure of redress which at times may be effective; in this particular case,

In addition to the fact that here communal concerns are taken on by a specifically organised minority of church leaders without a general mandate from the community, a significant transformation here concerns the church's emphasis on secrecy. (10) The latter element does not form a traditional rural pattern, but seems to relate to the fact that the church and its formal authority is imperfectedly legitimised : it does not spring from people's authority as such, but seems to derive from the post-colonial state and its formal judicial institutions, and it is exercised in a heterogeneous urban environment where many people do not formally subscribe to that authority even although, in an informal and diffuse manner, Christianity has managed to become some sort of a Great Tradition hovering above the many particularistic and autochthonous religious forms as found today (cf. van Binsbergen, 1981). The secrecy also protects the internal cohesion of the church membership, which could be negatively affected if use would be made of external, non-religious agencies of social control (urban court, but also family moots) - and at the township level these are discouraged by the church, as Mrs. Phin's statement suggests (11).

judicial micro-processes can be seen to operate all the time, and domestic and sexual matters are among their main topics. It is therefore highly significant that the townsip church lay organisations assert themselves as a judicial function in precisely these matters, in a situation where given the tender age of the township) family moots and ward leaders are still imperfectly operated, while the urban court is both distant and generally considered to offer real redress. The universalism of the church, its extension to non-members for material support and for a proselytism generally cast in moral terms, coupled to the fact that many marriages and other sexual unions are religiously mixed³⁹, guarantees the church a very real share of the ongoing informal judicial process in the emerging township.

38. However, Mr. Pitt's polygamous escapade has since proved even more occupyings a position of leadership in the church organization his wife is so prominent in.

That social and political aspirations are comparable to those of his wife becomes clear at the end of this interview. If the Christian lay organization provides a mechanism for the creation of political capital in the community, as I suggest, this handicap may well explain why his political career lagged behind that of his wife.

Finally, the church's lay organisations in the townships is presented as a structure of social control (9, 10). Here Mrs. Phiri's discussion of «backsliding» (6) is particularly relevant. In the Zambian Christian idiom, «backsliding» is an expression for an adherent's failure to live up to the strict moral code imposed by the church : monogamy, responsible family life, moderate drinking habits, avoidance of criminal offences, etc. In fighting «backsliding», the church is not merely protecting its membership quota but also exerting a more general form of social control, which is all the more important in the expanding urban environment - a new suburb where neighbourhood relations, voluntary associations and bureaucratic agencies such as the police have not yet been fully established.

In accordance with a South African undetraying pattern that applies both in urban and rural areas, individual sex behaviour is to a considerable extent subjected to public scrutiny and sanctioring. Not only rape but also adultery and pre-marital sex constitute offences actionable in formal state courts of law and before such customary, more informal judicial bodies as may provide functional alternatives to such courts : family law moots, the adjudications of village headmen and UNIP urban ward leaders.

In contemporary Zambia, both in rural areas and in towns, such informal structures of social control are still prevalent. In the townships, however, the adjudications of village headmen and UNIP urban ward leaders, the traditional alternatives to such courts, are no longer available. The traditional headmen, who were the chief arbiters in disputes between individuals and between individuals and the community, have lost their influence. The traditional headmen, who were the chief arbiters in disputes between individuals and between individuals and the community, have lost their influence. The traditional headmen, who were the chief arbiters in disputes between individuals and between individuals and the community, have lost their influence. The traditional headmen, who were the chief arbiters in disputes between individuals and between individuals and the community, have lost their influence.

Meanwhile it is remarkable that Mrs. Phiri's account already allows us to discern a historical pattern in the rural/urban continuity of crises intertwined by voluntary organisations as a function of rural support. She claims that in the past the church would extend its funerary care to include a quasi-kin responsibility for the surviving children (sc. in the rural areas), but that this has gone in disuse now. (7) This then is a point where the quasi-kin aspirations of the church reach a limit, which leaves room for other (kin-based, humanitarian or state) agencies for crisis support. Remarkably, a parallel structure of male and female leadership, and in general a strict gender-specific pattern of organisation is observed (5, 7). which does not stem from the logic of the church as a formal organisation but appears to reflect one of the constants of both urban and rural life in South Central Africa: a fairly rigid division of labour and of social organisation between the sexes. Here we encounter first being totally transformed, a rural input that is applied in town without first being totally transformed. A similar gender parallel returns in the political careers of Mrs. Phiri and her husband 38 (34).

With regard to a type of marital conflict which is very commonplace in urban Zambia (12), the effectiveness may be related to the considerable status benefits the church had to offer both spouses when complying with the church's intervention.

In the pre-Christian setting of Eastern Zambia and Malawi, stipulating very severe discipline⁴² even for the parents of the betrothed in case of pre-marital sex, it is clear that the church people encroach on and if possible usurp the parents' responsibility over the would-be spouses. All this of course must be seen in the light of the Catholic church's still absolute rejection of traditional purity training and the elements of initiation and pre-marital sex it may entail (9).

Traditional idioms of power

The lay organization's desire to wield social control over the domestic, marital and sexual domain combines with an implicit moral obligation to protect the community from sorcery. In the traditional rural model the latter has been a typical concern of village headmen and higher-level chiefs, while the church action against sorcery is presented in an idiom which suggests that sorcery is unchristian, this does not mean that sorcery no longer exists as a frame of reference and as a theory of causation. On the contrary, sorcery beliefs remain a touchstone of community leaders' traditional and moral effectiveness, even in town: Mrs Phiri suggests (in line with an abundance of converging evidence that falls outside our present scope) that the church people could not exert social control if they would shrink from the responsibility to battle against sorcerers - the greatest evil received traditionally in the societies of South Central Africa; so here again community and transnational at the same time (13).

The respondent is clearly aware of the fact that the secrecy dimension proceeds to invoke yet another outstation outside church Christianity. (14) And she stems from a source of inspiration outside church Christianity. (14) And she represesnt, on the part of the respondent, an additional claim to power, meant to support and augment such power as she derives, in the township, from the orbiting classes are largely figures, derived from the above mentioned sample survey (the 69 missing cases are largely those of non-Christians, whom the question does not apply):

were you ever disciplined by your church?		cases %
Total	96	100.0
yes	17	17.7
no	17	82.3

43. Since this attitude has much changed: one of my students, Miss T. Rasine, has recently studied a case of a Roman Catholic congregation in the Copperbelt, where strongly held ideas has much changed:

41. Author's research archive: "Urbanization, church and social control: A survey of Lusaka, Zambia, 1973: Summary of quantitative results - Part 1. USOCO results book II"; 41. Author's research archive: "Urbanization, church and social control: A survey of Lusaka, Zambia, 1973: Summary of quantitative results - Part 2. USOCO results book I".

Thoughts, the church lay organizations virtually claim as much influence wielded.

Part of this process is that a new model of consensual property is preferred: the Christian marriage, which gives the church agents a clear-cut model to enforce and a recognizable focus for the social control they seek to offer: the origin of this process is that a new model of consensual property is the original kin model!

Partners of social relations in order to articulate itself as an alternative quasi-regularization. The church then deliberately takes on neo-traditional forms and institutions of rural life to transform the rural interpretation of their have sought, and accepted, direct rural intervention: since much of their be that the township involved are somehow past the stage where they would be an important factor in the reliance on church-offered alternatives seems to bring together the necessary people for an informal family model. Therefore, looking for housing and employment, and it would often be quite easy to migrants can in fact make use of kin-based reciprocal structures when kinship role not exclusively for lack of kinsmen in town. Lusaka, and among We ought to appreciate that the church takes on this quasi-contamination but an alternative.

We ought to appreciate that the church takes on this quasi-traditional kinship rather of the modern/traditional than of the urban/rural type): the rules of consensual behavior are cast in a Christian idiom (and thus considerably deviate from rural custom (9), and the women's protagonists are only fictitious (or quasi-) kin. Althoughimitating essential elements of traditional kinship and marital structures, the church offers not a son-in-law in order to assert a daughter's personal rights in the face of services, this smacks rather of a kin group scoopin down on a subborn community rather than the wife to attend church functions a non-member husband in order to allow the wife to attend church can act as go-betweens between bride-givers and bride-takers (9), and partly organise the wedding. Likewise, when the church latiy model of kinship. Hence the church agents can offer pre-marital training, church's lay organization in the township again partially emulates the rural church's intervention in domestic and sexual matters the urban Zambia (12), the effectiveness may be related to the considerable status benefits the church had to offer both spouses when complying with the church's intervention.

Unable, thus, to emerge triumphant through the operation of formal modern agents of social control, and evidently having lost the kin battle in which she found herself contortioning not only her daughter-in-law and the latter's parents but also her own son, Mrs. Pitt reverts back to the anger of power: a sorely interpreted version of the conflict, and a continuation of the struggle along Socerry lines (28, 30). The unconvinicing use of a idiom of power is a generalised Christian charity can barely conceal her spite at no bellige able to attain the domestic power she aspired to (31).

(b) The local police, effective in separating the fighting prologomists.

(c) The urban court (25), which takes precedence in settling the case every if its formal adjudicating power is not wholeheartedly supported by the township party leadership (26).

(a) The party, which initially (when the party wins tries to intervene) remained ineffective, but which later asserted its self as an agent of social control in the township. It is only at this point that Christianity involved, merely as an excuse to opt out of the conflict resolution the local leadership has decided (3).

Victims to a strange hubris, the Phiris deprieved themselves, as church leaders, from the very services their organisation so generously extended to themselfs, the other inhabitants of Kapembere. The fact that the son's prospective laws were not even allowed to form an obstacle to his Christian weddimg. (18) Also the subsequent affinal struggle for domesti and family power was hardly pattered or mitigate by Christian considerations. (21, 24) When the affirmal conflict came to a head, the towmship's church organisaion is not even considered as an agent of conflict instead various other agents are stressed :

CHURCH AND SOCIAL CONTROL IN URBAN ZAMBIA

In the parents' situation as Christian leaders, and given the aspiration contemplated society actions. and the actual role of Christianity in Kapemperere township, an obvious was of strengthening the son's affirmal framework and thus of resolving the built in conflictting tendencies, would have been to contract a marriage that was not only Christian in form and appearance but that also involved committee mechanisms of conflict-escalating loyalties and crosscutting ties. Escalation, rural settings – like towns and cities – increased the surface area of conflict, as did urban centers that became necessary. And even so the conflict was not really intervention of the available formal conflict regulating agencies (police ineffective. The binding relationship was not kingship but residual property (they were neighbours in Kappemere). This rather loose single-strandedness precluded such dissipation of the built-in conflicts as might otherwise - especially in most cases - have been taken place at an early stage through the family.

However, these tensions tend to urban transformation in so far as they are allowed to become exceptionally virulent and insoluble – particularly because the framework of formal relationships on which the son's newly formed nuclear family was to define itself, proved utterly and finally migrants has sought cohabitation in their children's generation. (18) In the mother's (Mrs. Smith's) perception, these investments are to pay off: (a) in the form of the son's newly created family, and (b) through Mrs.

The conflict has at least two levels: the domestic sphere, and that of the public society. At the domestic level, when the son is introduced to his parents' generation of urban families and political level, he achieves status in his parents' generation of urban families and political level. First, the domestic structure of Kappemperde becomes clear that erect upon each other. We see her invoke a number of agents of social control, between which she wields, and portrays a number of successes, both in the domestic sphere and within the partitions of power and successfily switches in an attempt to articulate her as hot give offence in such a inter-national and offinal drama within the towne

And in this eminently successful urban woman, the loss of her son's loyalty in combination with her resorting to the idiom of sorcery ever so faintly evokes one of the most powerful collective representations of South Central African society – an image of great rural-urban continuity that, in its sinister implication of the insolubility of inter-generational conflict, seems hardly in need of transformation : the parent who through sorcery sacrifices his or her child in exchange for magical success in the entrepreneurial, medical or political field.

Conclusion

My analysis has sought to illuminate religious aspects of the urban situation of Zambia, suggesting that social relationships found there, and the social process to which they give rise over time, are shaped by the subtle, kaleidoscopic and creative dialectics between traditional, rural-based continuity and modern urban-based transformation, so as to enable the urban Church congregation to be truly «a place to feel at home» – an interpretative position which has been particularly dear to Robert Buijtenhuijs and which has proven to be fruitful in his own studies of African religion. The formal organisations, especially the churches, by which modern urbanites structure their urban life assume functions and aspirations which can only be understood against the background of pre-existing rural traditional patterns, yet cater for needs of crisis support, social control, conflict regulation and the expression of group identity, leadership and an emerging class structure as are specific for the urban environment. This provides a framework within which to identify, trace and understand urban social processes such as they manifest themselves at the micro level of urban social dramas, but only on the basis of a consideration of both rural continuity and urban transformation. The pattern of relationships that thus opens up for analysis turns out to be as unmistakably urban, modern and transformative, as it remains faithful, at the same time, to the patterns of South Central African rural-based cultural orientation so adequately established by the anthropology of earlier decades⁴⁴.

44. Recently, the discussion of the interplay of urban and rural themes in Zambian towns has been further developed by Ferguson, J., 1997 and 1999.